A Dialogue between a proud, idle, ſoppiſh Husband, and a ſcolding Wife.

Husband, Here, wife, let's ſee my ſlippers, cap and gown,
Help off my coat, z---ds! madam, how you frown!
As if thro' pride you thought yourſelf to good
T'attend your Husband as a woman ſhou'd.
Don't uſe me ſo as you've done him before,
For if you do, I'll make your carcaſs ſore.

Wife. Do if you can, for if I have done ill,
In ſpite of all your craft I'll do ſo ſtill,
And if I am a proud and ſurly Creature,
Threats, words or blows ſhall never make me better.

Husband. Pride has bewicht and fill'd thy breaſt with evil,
And chang'd thee from a woman to a devil:
But I'm reſolv'd the maſtery to keep,
And fickt poor ——'s ſoul who is aſleep
I'the ſilent grave, juſt four years now this day,
And haſten'd to his death by you they ſay
Certain it was that he could never pleaſe you,
Therefore I am reſolv'd to vex and teaze you.

MORAL

The wife that has not ſence to know
Obedience is her duty
Makes but a curſed wife, altho'
She abounds in wealth and beauty:
For her fair features and her bags,
That made her ſpouſe aſſume her,
Will be o'er ballanc'd with the plague
Of her contentious humour.
If woman once has fix'd her mind
On any vice or failing;
If you'd reclaim her, who can find
What way is moſt prevailing?
Hard words provoke and make her worſe,
Blows raiſe her Indignation:
He's wiſe that can preſcribe what courſe.
Will work her reformation.

Mr. TIMOTHY,

Being a conſtant Reader of your Paper (tho' at preſent unknown) I have made bold to trouble you with the following Paragraph, occaſioned by a late Piece of Wit in the Gazette of the 24th Inſtant.

I am heartily glad to find any Gentleman of this Province ſo careful for the Well-doing of the reſt of his Sex, but however I would not have a Perſon be ſo anxious about his Neighbour's Misfortunes as to forget his own: As to black Beauties and Places of Intreague, I am affraid Experience has made the Gentleman too wiſe, and tho' he has not yet, may by and by find more to cool his Courage than he intends for others, but however from his Care for us in giving ſo good a Caution, we ſhall take more Pain and endeavour to find out a Name that we may be able to return the Complement to his Face, and in the mean Time beg the Gentleman to accept the following Lines.

From your own taſte don't judge another's Gou'ſt
Kiſs black or white, why need it trouble you?
Of all the things that make us truly bleſt,
Is not that dear variety the beſt?
Advice, tis true, ſometimes may do us good,
But what's advice from one ſo plainly rude?
We know your meaning, and the mood you're in,
The D---- often is correcting ſin
